	This is an overused word or phrase, or too casual for a research paper.
	Read this phrase out loud, and then rewrite it to be clearer to the reader.
	You need to identify a source for this information.
	See the Guide to Writing Errors.
	Start a new paragraph here.

Again, this is not about anything highlighted in purple or gray. For each incident, cut and paste the complete sentence into the table below. Then think about why I highlighted the words or phrases, or why I included a comment about a writing issue.

NOTE: If the blue-colored phrase is obviously a cliché (e.g. “better safe than sorry”), then you don’t need to include it here.

For pink phrases, it may help to read the sentence out loud or to show it to someone else. It made sense to you when you wrote it, but it didn’t make sense to this reader.

If something’s highlighted in yellow, you can find the problem on the Guide to Writing Errors page.

I arbitrarily chose eight rows as the number. If you need to add one or more rows, minor-click on the table and insert a row above or below.

You don’t need to write the corrected version here – that’s what the final draft is for.

Paste the complete sentence here.	Why do you think I highlighted the words or phrases?

Every breath is like the last, the pain from organ failure possesses her whole body.	I forgot to put conjunction.
Pills and piles all over her body, she had no choice but to keep suffering even though death is almost sentenced in a few months.	I meant pipe, and I'll make it "tubes". "sentenced" to "certain"
In the meantime, it is the people who enjoy great health that decide whether the patients can end their living hell.	It is too subjective for a research paper.
Pennsylvania should legalize assisted suicide and simultaneously ameliorate their long-term and palliative care.	Government is not a person, so I should've used "its".
On top of that, long-term and palliative care should also be taken care of since the main purpose is not to encourage people to resort to death.	"On top of that" is too casual. "Additionally, Moreover, Furthermore"
Being much more widely recognized compared to MAID is the only reason why "assisted suicide" is used for the term topic.	It is a redundant sentence.
The demand for assisted dying has existed for over a hundred years and it is time for the governments to take initiative.	I forgot to put coma before "and".
Pennsylvania should follow their footsteps, endeavoring to help the patients that are suffering.	"Follow food steps" is too informal. "Emulate, Join them"
These Bills have been in pending status since April 2025 (Compassion & Choices, n.d.).	"Bill" should not be capitalized here.
Nevertheless, for the past seven months, there has not been a single committee hearing, suggesting that the process is stagnant or even worse—ignored on purpose. Although speculation shouldn't be made since there is no evidence, the House and Senate failed to do their job responding to the advocates.	It is too subjective.
Recognizing that the right to live or die should be returned to the terminally ill patients, the problem with opposing perspectives will be illustrated.	I think it is correct.
These arguments have a common flaw—they start from various perspectives but not the	The sentence isn't clear about what the arguments are referring patients'.	to.

Everyone strives to protect the healthy people; however, those undergoing tremendous pain should not keep suffering for their procrastination and overthinking.	It's too subjective.
They argue that assisting in ending life is a violation of the Hippocratic Oath, oath of ethics historically taken by physicians.	I should add "the" before "oath".
However, all of them hold a perspective from the non-patients which drowns out the voices of the terminally ill patients.	"Drowns out the voices" is not appropriate phrasing in research paper. "neglect"
Since they do not have the strength to write papers, lawmakers might mistake it as lack of support for the policy.	It's a unrelsted and confusing sentence.
As the world evolves, moral standards and mindsets change with the era.	It's too ambiguous.
Granting them an option to die doesn't mean supporting their death.	It's too ambiguous. Not "support" but "encourage".
Foley and Hendin (2002) believe improving long-term and palliative care is the right way out.	"the right way out" is not appropriate phrasing in research paper. "Decision or Solution..."
This will be surely conducive to saving more lives but not everyone can be such enduring.	People can't be enduring but things can be.
Especially for terminally ill people, even by consuming analgesics, the pain doesn't necessarily mitigate. The frustration and affliction devour them both physically and mentally, and their dignity is still underprivileged.	They needs evidence. Dignity would not be underprivileged.
If it works for Oregon, it might work for Pennsylvania as well.	It is phrased too casually. "Considering Oregon's success, Pennsylvania is likely to yield similar results."
Vulnerable groups are more likely to encounter discrimination and pressures from the society, which is why there are multiple campaigns and demonstrations supporting the less.	The main purpose of the sentence is confusing and it needs evidence.

However, sometimes the best way to prevent human from doing something is to let them decide.	The sentence is awkward and unnecessary. I will delete it.
The evidence shows our fears are overblown and exaggerated; legalizing MAID in Pennsylvania is beneficial and practical.	The words “overblown” and “exaggerated” are too casual. “fears are not based on facts”
This research paper supports MAID legalization in Pennsylvania, expounding on the autonomy of patients, the opinion bias from the scholars, actions should be made by Pennsylvania and how the vulnerable groups are statistically not forced to ask for MAID.	The sentence is too long and confusing to the readers.
Imagine yourself paralyzed in the bed, seeing people living a normal life just makes you feel inferior and insecure.	It is inappropriate for research papers.
